Part 2 of a 5 Part Series Improving Hands-on Care

The quality of care that a person receives at home and in facilities is one of the most pressing and persistent areas of concern for people living with Alzheimer's and their families. The challenges to offering quality care are intricate and complex. And the political implications for raising the standard of care need to be explored. This 5 part series will look at each of these elements in turn.

Part 2: June 6th: Concerns of Families and Friends

Families and friends give their feedback about the quality of hands-on care provided in facilities and offered by home health care companies. What is working and what is not? We invite all families to come and be part of this important discussion.

Upcoming Sessions:

Part 3: August 1st: Point of View from Professional Caregivers

Those hired to provide hands-on care in home and in facilities share their daily experiences, their challenges, and potential solutions to problems they encounter.

Part 4: September 5th: Executive Directors

Executive directors and administrators of skilled nursing, memory care, and assisted living facilities as well as owners and managers of home health care companies discuss their concerns and challenges in hiring and retaining skilled employees.

Part 5: October 3rd: The Politics of Improving Care

Local, state, and national representatives join us to discuss the findings and conclusions from this speaker series. Can a path to better care be legislated? What can our elected representatives do to improve care that is offered to those living with Alzheimer's and other forms of cognitive impairment? How can better care become a priority?
